Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Then, wiping her eyes, I sha n t cry any more; for, if I m not the happiest woman in the world, I ought to be. And what a nice time we shall have together, dear Ned! each wholly devoted to the other all winter long. I have it all planned out: while you are out about the plantation in the mornings, I ll attend to my housekeeping and my studies; and in the afternoons and evenings, -after I ve recited, -we can write our letters, or entertain ourselves and each other with music or books; you can read to me while I work, you know. Yes: a book is twice as enjoyable read in that way-sharing the pleasure with you, he said, softly stroking her hair, and smiling down into her eyes. Especially if it is a good story, or a bit of lovely poetry, she added. Yes, he said: we ll have both those in turn, and some solid reading besides. I don t like solid reading, she returned, with a charming pout. One may cultivate a taste for it, I think, he answered pleasantly. But you can t cultivate what you haven t got, she objected. True enough, he said, laughing. Well, then, we ll try to get a little first, and cultivate it carefully afterward. I must go now, love, he added, releasing her: the men need some directions from me, in regard to their work. And the women some from me, said Zoe. Oh! you needn t laugh, Ned, shaking her finger at him, as he turned in the doorway to give her an amused glance: perhaps some of these...
